

MR. BIN'S DIFFICULTY.

"What's got into this shirt, Mrs. Bin?" asked him, as he struggled and stared with a desperate attempt to erase himself in a clean shirt that Mrs. Bin had laid out for him the night previous. "What has got into it? I don't know," said she yawning, "what's in it, unless it is yourself." She had hardly got her eyes open, it was so early in the morning; she had, in fact, been awakened from her slumber by Mr. Bin's anxious questions as to what there was in the shirt. It was a queer question for a respectable lady of forty to hear at so solemn an hour in the morning at four o'clock, and she didn't half comprehend it; but when she became fully conscious she smiled as she turned the question over in her mind, and then she turned herself over, and looked at Mr. Bin's operations, dimly revealed by a sickly, consumptive looking lamp.

Mr. Bin was going to Albany that morning by the first train, and the night previous Mrs. Bin had carefully laid out the aforelaid garment for him to put on for the journey. Everything had been got ready over night for an early start—boots were blackened, shaving had been performed, the valise packed, and the shirt would most undoubtedly have been donned then with the other preparations, had not he feared of rumpling it during sleep. At 4 o'clock he had awaked, and fairly got on his pants in his haste, before he recollected the shirt.

He had that strange, woolly feeling about the eyes, which one experiences before the morning ablutions are performed, and everything was seen through a cloudy medium, which was not relieved by the lamp most dimly burning. Under this disadvantage Mr. B. sought the garment which he had rested the night previous. All right: and now in a great hurry he seizes upon it thrusts his head within its folds; pushes desperately for the arms, and gets it on somehow. "Blame the thing!" muttered he to himself, at first gently, and then louder; "where is the button?" and he fumbled away desperately in the dark; and then "What has got into this shirt?" closed the string of ejaculations, and Mrs. B., answering in manner and form as above, turned over. "There isn't any stitching in the dicky," growled he, "and the buttons are all on the wrong side; I can't make head nor tail of it. Here he gave another plunge through the cotton. "It seems as if the Old One himself was in it." "I shouldn't be surprised," said Mrs. B. rising on her elbow. "It could have been that she wished to convey the idea that she thought her spouse the veritable being whom all good beings hold in such holy horror; but she wished to say something, and this was an acquiescent response to the suggestion of Mr. B. Sympathy goes far in soothing trouble.

His face was red and stony. He, in fancy, heard the car bell ringing in the passengers, and he heard the shrill notes of the engine, as it guily travelled over the ground, whistling as a ploughman proverbially whistles; and he saw expecting correspondents turn away from the depot, cursing his delinquency, and here he was, a hundred miles away, dancing about his chamber with doubtful probability of getting his shirt on.

"Bring the light," said Mrs. B., "and let me look at it." Mr. B., did as he was desired. He strove no longer—his master spirit had strove against the wave of adversity, and it had overwhelmed him; and humbly he obeyed, childlike that simple direction, to bring the light.

It was a misnomer by the way, for never was baptismal appellation more inappositely bestowed, that struggled there for existence, a fight.

He brought himself and light before his then in truth, helpmate—"Why, for Heaven's sake!" (Mr. Bin didn't exactly see the relevancy of the ejaculation.) "For Heaven's sake, Mr. Bin! you've got your shirt on bottom side up."

The truth flashed upon him at once that such must be the act, and he straightway proceeded to remedy the difficulty. This was speedily done, and he arrived at the cars just in season. The whole journey he was thinking about it, and thanking his lucky stars that he had a wife to consult in trouble.
